Seward, an artist, not for bread and butter alone, but for the love of it, has visions of a beautiful face which humis his dreama His mind so dwells upon this beautiful creation of his imagination that he becomes firmly convinced that the girl of his dreams is an actual being in fiesh and blood. Some day he expects to meet her, and he has made up his mind that when he does meet her he will ask her to become his wife. The portrait impressed upon his memory is so distinct that he spends his leisure hours in reproducing the lovely features on canvas.

One day Capt. Sparks, an old-time friend of Seward, whose business is that of a contraband smuggler, arrives from one of his filibustering expeditions and calls to see Seward. They make the ocasion one for renewing old friendships and discussing their adventures. After dinner Seward takes the captain to his studio and unveils the portrait of the girl of his dreams. The captain is all excitement. He declares that he knows the ment. He declares that he knows the has just been rescued for her from the criminals.

Seward exhibits the picture of his "dream girl," and tells the story to Dolores. He is already her hero, and girl; that instead of being a dream girl, she is an actual person, and he proceeds to tell with vivid description of how he had seen the girl kidnapped by a party of ruffians and taken out to sea in a boat. The very sword that he has brought to his friend, Seward, as a souvenir was one left behind by the party of kidnappers when the captain bravely tried to save the girl from them. The captain's description is so vivid that Seward makes up his mind to accompany the captain on his return trip into the tropics with the hope of finding some meetings tomorrow at 4 p. m., in the association building, with Hon. sall ner an army he put in motion. Cotton is the hanks of high explosives and of smelaless powder. The armor-clad warship carries relatively more cotton than was used by the frigate of a contary ago with all its sails.

Wool was discarded long ago for uniforms and cetton clothes the armies of the world-yes, and all the people of the sum's beat. The arctic explorer pads his duck suit with cotton and finds it warmer and lighter than fur.

ten and finds it warmer and lighter than fur.

It is quident, therefore, that cotton touches all the world. But clething is only one of the many points of contact. Cotton is the chief ingredient of the automobile. Those soft cushions are cotton felt covered with more cotton that looks like leather and you go bounding on inflated cotton tires treated with rubber. Bangi There is a puncture. It's a hole in the cotton and the rubber is no good without the cotton.

Other material might be used, but cotton is used, therefore, most of the business of the country would be paralyzed if cottom were not available.

Cotton is not king. We don't like kings in America. Cotton is the master and the servant of all the people. Cotton is all things to all men. After clothing them and housing them, it makes all their paths smooth and still has energy left to fatten cattle with its seed. When the great American hog falls down on his job of shortening our hot biscuits, cotton the great American hog falls down on his job of shertening our hot biscuits, cotton is ready to do the work more cheaply and more delicately. Let us sing praises to cotton to the strains of sweet music pumped through the organ by cotton bellows.

This is the age of cotton. The world has achieved its greatest progress since Eii Whitney invented the cotton gin.

Eliminate cotton and the mere stoppag of spindles and looms would be but trifle compared with the paralysis tha trife compared with the paralysis that would visit countless other industries. In the last year a new high record has been established for the consumption of cotton by the world, the total being more than 13,000,000 bales.

The railroads and trolley lines of the United States use more than 250,000 bales of cotton a year for enameled cellings, plush chairs, leather seats and air-brake base. The automobile consumes about

It is no wonder, therefore, that the whole world takes such intense interest in the calamity that has overcome the cotton industry. It is evident, however, the more sensible and economically sound it seemed to be. Beginning with newspaper stories, carrying pictures of Miss Clark, Miss Callie Hoke Smith, daughter of Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia; Miss Lucy Burleson, daughter of the Postmaster General, who joined with Miss Clark in the first an aubstantial, once the initial shock has been adjusted.
